Copyright without changing the namespace pointer to something else can produce stale links. One way to do it is to keep a reference counter but this doesn't work as soon as one move the element or the subtree out of the scope of the existing namespace. The actual solution seems to add a copy of the namespace at the top of the copied tree if not available in the subtree. Hence two functions, the public front-end call the inner ones The argument "recursive" normally indicates a recursive copy of the node with values 0 (no) and 1 (yes). For XInclude, however, we allow a value of 2 to indicate copy properties and namespace info, but don't recurse on children.

Copyright without changing the namespace pointer to something else can produce stale links. One way to do it is to keep a reference counter but this doesn't work as soon as one move the element or the subtree out of the scope of the existing namespace. The actual solution seems to add a copy of the namespace at the top of the copied tree if not available in the subtree. Hence two functions, the public front-end call the inner ones The argument "recursive" normally indicates a recursive copy of the node with values 0 (no) and 1 (yes). For XInclude, however, we allow a value of 2 to indicate copy properties and namespace info, but don't recurse on children.

Users wonder when they should provide more input, when they should use more output, what to do with a <tt>Z_BUF_ERROR</tt>, how to make sure the process terminates properly, and so on. So for those who have read <tt>zlib.h</tt> (a few times), and would like further edification, below is an annotated example in C of simple routines to compress and decompress from an input file to an output file using <tt>deflate()</tt> and <tt>inflate()</tt> respectively. The annotations are interspersed between lines of the code. So please read between the lines. We hope this helps explain some of the intricacies of zlib.
